DISSERTATION:

“Deadbeat Dads, Single Moms, and Broken Homes?: Parents’ Experiences in the Child Support System”

This project examines the experiences of parents involved with the child support system. I conduct ethnographic field research in a child support system in Central Virginia including observations of 300+ child support hearings and 75+ hours in child support related sites, as well as 50+ formal and informal interviews with parents and individuals working in the system child support system officials in Virginia and New Jersey (i.e. judges, mediators, and Division of Child Support Enforcement staff). I also analyze a diverse collection of cultural artifacts (i.e. federal, state, and municipal statutes; news articles and video clips; and political rhetoric). Using a sociocognitive theoretical framework, I examine the ways that involvement with the system impacts the conceptualization of the family and parenthood. My observations and interviews illuminate the ways that shame and stigma are pervasive in social interactions, how parents both resist and reinforce the implications of the system’s bureaucratic apparatus, and the collateral consequences of enforcement practices. Ultimately, I demonstrate that the child support system is a neoliberal construct at the intersection of the welfare and criminal justice systems which reinforces cultural messages about deservingness, morality, responsibility, and the desirability of traditional family structures. Committee: Chair – Eviatar Zerubavel, Board of Governors and Distinguished Professor of Sociology; Ethel Brooks, Associate Professor of Sociology and Women's and Gender Studies; Lenna Nepomnyaschy, Associate Professor of Social Work and Planning and Public Policy; Outside Reader – Maureen Waller, Associate Professor of Policy Analysis and Management, Cornell University
