DISSERTATION:

“‘They’re Stealing My Opportunity to Be a Father’: The Child Support System and State Intervention in the Family” This project examines the experiences of parents involved with the child support system. I conducted ethnographic field research in a child support system in Central Virginia including observations of 300 child support hearings and 75+ hours in child support related sites, as well as 50 formal and informal interviews with parents and individuals working in the system child support system officials in Virginia and New Jersey (i.e. judges, mediators, and Division of Child Support Enforcement staff). I also analyzed a diverse collection of cultural artifacts (i.e. federal, state, and municipal statutes; news articles and video clips; and political rhetoric). Using a sociocognitive theoretical framework, I examined the ways that state intervention in the family vis-à-vis involvement with the system impacts the conceptualization of the family and parenthood. My observations and interviews illuminate the ways that stigma and shame are pervasive in social interactions, how parents both resist and reinforce the implications of the system’s bureaucratic apparatus, and the collateral consequences of enforcement practices. Ultimately, I demonstrate that the child support system is a neoliberal construct at the intersection of the welfare and criminal justice systems
